AMERICAN AFFAIRS IN ENGLAND
MENT-SPEECH OF EARL RUSSELL

In the House of Lords on the 24th March
The Earl of Russell, in a speech of great length and power, discussed the American question.

He said that the American people were entitled to the same respect and consideration as the British people.

It appears from a correspondence published on our first page this morning that the Hon. George H. Yerrinton addressed the people of Owensboro Monday last on the political issues of the day. We congratulate the people of Owensboro for having secured a candidate for re-election to the Congress of the United States. His past course in Congress has been marked by wisdom and ability, and his Kentucky may well be proud of him as one of her noblest sons. The Union men of the Second District will heartily sustain him now as they have done in preceding Congress. Mr. Yerrinton had been growing in popularity since the proposed amendment to the constitution. He did so with an enlightened view of the real condition of affairs, and by his action then he is willing to stand for all. The Union men of the Second District who appreciate the interests of Kentucky and the nation will rally to his support. We hope to receive a report of the speech which Mr. Yerrinton delivered at Owensboro.

The Old Potomac Army, the first encampment of which closed in defeat and disaster, has at last achieved, through four long years of conflict, the crowning glory of the war. Its history is fraught with marvelous incidents, perils, and escapes. To great soldiers, to great leaders, first to protect the national capital against the invaders' threat, next, to capture and hold the city of Richmond itself. Over the hills, through the valleys, and across the mountains, the Potomac army has been driven backward and forward through alternate reverses and triumphs, until now the battle of Manassas, then followed by the battle of Bull Run, and the battle of Antietam, have given it a grandeur and glory that no other army has ever known. The Potomac army, which was driven from the bloody plain of Manassas, then followed by the battle of Bull Run, and the battle of Antietam, have given it a grandeur and glory that no other army has ever known. The Potomac army, which was driven from the bloody plain of Manassas, then followed by the battle of Bull Run, and the battle of Antietam, have given it a grandeur and glory that no other army has ever known.

It is a grand and glorious story, the story of the Potomac army, which was driven from the bloody plain of Manassas, then followed by the battle of Bull Run, and the battle of Antietam, have given it a grandeur and glory that no other army has ever known. In view of the early suppression of the rebellion and the cessation of hostilities between the North and South, a certain class of overbearing politicians urge that the United States, to vindicate our national honor, should speedily declare war against either England or France. It is urged that the French should be declared war against because they have been declared war against by the United States, and that England should be declared war against because they have been declared war against by the United States. It is urged that the French should be declared war against because they have been declared war against by the United States, and that England should be declared war against because they have been declared war against by the United States.

The declarations now heard in favor of a foreign war arise from that basest spirit which has been engendered by the complete triumph which the Union has won over the Southern rebellion. In the present excitement, the majority of the people are so much excited that they are willing to believe that the Union has won a complete triumph over the Southern rebellion.
